Now listen, children, young and old,
God multiplies ten-thousandfold
The little power that we bring.
He makes our winter weakness sing
Of his full summer’s strength, and burns
The rags of shame to ashes, turns
The course of history, blocks
The haughty schemes of strutting cocks,
And brings the prophecies of men
To naught. And rising up, he then,
Against all high conspiracies,
And proud imperial machines,
Makes orphans into kings and queens.”

Capturing our imaginations and hearts,
John Piper introduces us to Esther the poor
orphan and Esther the Persian queen—creatively musing about what could have been in the midst of what really was. Using poetry to tell a moving story, Piper’s words awakens wonder in us as we experience the begin-ings and endings of Esther’s life and see throughout the purposeful hand of God.

JOHN PIPER is pastor for preaching and vision at Bethlehem Baptist Church in Minneapolis. He is author of more than forty books, including five works of poetry:
The Prodigal’s Sister, Ruth, Job, Velvet Steel, and
The Innkeeper.

GLEN HARRINGTON is an internationally recognized painter whose art has been featured on the cover of over 600 books. His paintings have also been a focal point in many publications, including The Artists Magazine, and The Philadelphia Inquirer.

Paintings by Glenn Harrington
OTHER POETRY BOOKS
BY JOHN PIPER

The Innkeeper
The Misery of Job and the Mercy of God
The Prodigal’s Sister
Ruth
Velvet Steel
ESTHER

JOHN PIPER
Paintings by Glenn Harrington

CROSSWAY
WHEATON, ILLINOIS
Every Advent season for twenty-seven years I wrote narrative poems as a kind of Christmas gift to the church I pastor. Esther is one of those gifts.

I have loved poetry since I was a teenager. It has always seemed plain to me that the imagination is a gift of God and is meant to reflect his own creativity. He thought up the universe out of nothing, then created us in his own image. So we do that kind of thing. Not that very thing. But that kind of thing. Only God creates out of nothing. We are not God. But we are like him when we create.

Perhaps this is why I feel so at home when writing poetry. I don’t mean I feel relaxed or in control. I usually don’t. I mean: This is who I am—who God made me to be. A creator, a maker. I suspect that deep down that’s the way we all feel when we are making what God made us to make. A poem is not necessarily a better thing to make than a birthday cake, or a rose garden, or a website. But it is one of the things I love to make.

What I mean by poetry is this: “An effort to share a moving experience by using language that is chosen and structured differently from ordinary prose.” Sometimes it rhymes. Sometimes it doesn’t. Sometimes it has a regular cadence. Sometimes it doesn’t. But almost always the poet has experienced something—something horrible or wonderful or ordinary—and he feels that he must share it. Using words differently from ordinary prose is his way of trying to awaken something of this experience (and more) in the reader.

When I read the Bible, I experience God. This is the astonishing power and dignity God has given to his Word. He meets us there. “The Lord revealed himself to Samuel at Shiloh by the word of the Lord” (1 Sam. 3:21). This is amazing. We meet God himself by the Word.

And when we do, we are affected. It may be terror, or it may be ecstasy, or it may be an inexpressible peace. But for poets, at least, experiencing something inexpressible does not mean silence. It’s precisely the inexpressible something that poetry is meant to help us see or feel. If it were merely expressible—if there were nothing ineffable about it—there would be no need for a poem. But everywhere in the Bible we meet reality that exceeds our comprehension. We must find a way to at least point or suggest or hint. It’s too wonderful—or too something—to keep to ourselves.

So it is with the book of Esther. This book never mentions God. But he is everywhere—the invisible hand that moves empires for the sake of his people. The invisibility of his name in the book is a pointer to the invisibility of his majestic rule in history. Human designs are inexorably undone. And the way God turns the tables is breathtaking.

The king can’t sleep. So someone reads to him the royal records of “memorable deeds.” All of this just so that Haman, the arrogant Jew hater, by a fluke encounter, would be forced to honor Mordecai—the Jew (chapter 6). Such things are everywhere in this book. The invisible God is everywhere behind them. Just as he was at Golgotha.

I won’t try to say in this introduction what moved me most in reading Esther. That’s what the poem is for. But I will say how I go about it. I retell the story by filling in possibilities of what might have been, mingled with what really was. My aim is to respect what really was by creating nothing that could not have been. Nothing has been changed in the biblical story. And what has been created is not Scripture. It is meant to awaken us to the wonder of what is really there. Here are some historical facts that we know:

- The kingdom of Babylon fell before Cyrus the Persian in 539 BC. The people of Israel had, by that time, been in captivity in Babylon for decades.
- In 538 BC, Cyrus decreed that the Jews could return to their homeland.
- Ahasuerus reigned as king of Persia from 485 to 464 BC.
- Esther became queen in Persia about the year 479 BC.
- Susa, where the story of the book of Esther takes place, was the capital of the Persian Empire and lay about 350 miles southeast of Babylon.
- Esther was Mordecai’s cousin, “the daughter of Abihail the uncle of Mordecai” (Est. 2:15). “She had neither father nor mother” (Est. 2:7).
- Mordecai was “the son of Jair, son of Shimei, son of Kish, a Benjaminite” (Est. 2:5). I have treated Abihail and Jair as brothers and both as the sons of Shimei, who would then be Esther’s grandfather. Shimei was thus old enough to have been among the Babylonian captives. I treat him as not returning to Palestine but dreaming of some destiny in Persia.

- Nabonidus was the last king of Babylon and was defeated by Cyrus the Persian.
- Borsippa was a city about twelve miles southwest of Babylon.
- Nippur was a neighboring city along with its surrounding region.
- Opis was the Babylonian city where Nabonidus made his last stand against the Persians.
- Hadassah was Esther’s Jewish name (Est. 2:7), which means “myrtle.”

These are the historical realities I try to honor in my retelling of Esther’s story. Don’t get bogged down trying to figure out genealogies. Let the story carry you forward.

Perhaps a short comment on reading poetry would be helpful. Beware of thinking the line breaks signal pauses or emphases. They don’t. They will do their best work for you if you ignore them. Only pause when there is a punctuation mark. This way the stilted sound we associate with bad poems (ta-DA ta-DA ta-DA, pause, ta-DA ta-DA ta-DA) will be, happily, avoided. There is a cadence that matters. But its effect will be felt most if it is read and heard effortlessly and unself-consciously.

I read recently that one well-known English teacher tells his students that we must rid ourselves of the notion that poems can be made sense of in a single reading.
That’s probably true. It takes one or two times through to discover even how it should be read, let alone what it means. When the cadence is caught, and the wording is familiar, the stroll through the poem does not require much attention to the path, and you can lift up your eyes to the vistas.

I must stop. I’ve perhaps already said too much. Poems are poems. They should stand pretty much on their own. I hope you enjoy Esther.
The year five hundred thirty-nine
Was filled with hope. The western sun
Set once for all on Babylon;
And Nabonidus fell before
The Persian forces at the door
Of Opis. Mighty Cyrus, king
Of Persia, set his signet ring
Upon the seal of victory,
And published in his first decree
That Jews could now return to live
Again in Jacob's land, and give Themselves to serve the living God.
Far east of ruined Palestine
The year five hundred thirty-nine
Was filled with hope. The western sun
Set once for all on Babylon;
And Nabonidus fell before
The Persian forces at the door
Of Opis. Mighty Cyrus, king
Of Persia, set his signet ring
Upon the seal of victory,
And published in his first decree
That Jews could now return to live
Again in Jacob’s land, and give
Themselves to serve the living God.
But there were some who took the rod
Of God’s chastisement so to heart
That now their faith and hope would chart
Another course: at least one clan
Within the tribe of Benjamin,
The clan of Shimei, would stay
In pagan Babylon and pray
That now, and generations hence,
God might, in gracious providence,
Be pleased to use them for some great
And saving work—to penetrate,
Perhaps, some curse beyond the bounds
Of Israel, with joyful sounds
Of sovereign love.
Some forty years
Of hope and prayer and frequent tears
Went by in Babylon. One night
A million brilliant stars sang bright
Against the sable Persian sky,
And called the aged Shimei
To climb the ancient cliffs beside
The dark Euphrates, up the pride
Of Borsippa. With Abihail
His youngest son he took the trail
That led to Nippur Ridge, and stood
There with a woolen traveller’s hood
Hung halfway on his snowy head.
And facing to the east he said,
Some forty years
Of hope and prayer and frequent tears
Went by in Babylon. One night
A million brilliant stars sang bright
Against the sable Persian sky,
And called the agèd Shimei
To climb the ancient cliffs beside
The dark Euphrates, up the pride
Of Borsippa. With Abihail
His youngest son he took the trail
That led to Nippur Ridge, and stood
There with a woolen traveller's hood
Hung halfway on his snowy head.
And facing to the east he said,
I had a dream, my son, that some Day what we’ve longed to see will come,
Not here, but even farther east,
And that for you and me, at least,
The promise that the Lord has planned
Is not found in the Promised Land.
But I am old, and so the dream
Is yours, my son. And if it seem Too slow, doubt not the faithfulness
Of God; one generation lives
And dies to serve the next; he gives
A glimpse to Moses ‘cross the vale,
And me tonight. But, Abihail, Tomorrow take your wife, though she
Is great with child and frailty,
And set your face toward Susa where
The king sits on his throne; and there
Beyond the Tigris serve the Lord
Of hosts, and wait until the cord
Of providence is woven full.
Then God will set his heel, and pull
The powers of the world into
The service of his love for you,
And for his children scattered through
The empire. Yes! Mark now, and do
As I have said. God will provide
For you, doubt not, and for your bride,
And for the child. Be strong, my son,
You will not be alone. The one
Who governs dreams, and gives Us everything we need, and lives
On ev’ry inch of ground we tread,
Will be with you. You will be led;
And lest you feel alone, he spoke
These words, ’My soul will not revoke
The promise I have made. Go now,
My chosen, Abihail. My vow
And pledge is this: that with you I Will send your nephew, Mordecai.’’"
The pretty girl sat on the floor
Beside the fire and said once more
To Mordecai, "Abba, how did
My mother die? You haven’t hid
Such things from me for all these years;
And late at night I see the tears
Roll down your cheek, and I must feel
That it would help if we could kneel
Before the Lord and bear this thing
Together. You and I could sing.
Then, eye to eye about the ways
Of God. And wouldn’t those dark days
Reveal the same God that you’ve taught Me these twelve years to trust? And ought
I not to know then, Mordecai,
How both my parents came to die?"
The pretty girl sat on the floor Beside the fire and said once more To Mordecai, “Abba, how did My mother die? You haven’t hid Such things from me for all these years; And late at night I see the tears Roll down your cheek, and I must feel That it would help if we could kneel Before the Lord and bear this thing Together. You and I could sing, Then, eye to eye about the ways Of God. And wouldn’t those dark days Reveal the same God that you’ve taught Me these twelve years to trust? And ought I not to know then, Mordecai, How both my parents came to die?”
The road from here to Babylon
Is hard, Hadassah. It’s not fun,
And even less if you’re a Jew.
And we were three—or four, with you.
Three hundred miles of sweat and hate.
And you were big and three weeks late.
And no one gave us room. The heat
Was indescribable. Her feet
Were swollen, scarlet hot. He prayed,
Your father, Abihail, for shade.
That’s all! Not for a house or nurse,
Or stream or birthing stool or purse
To bribe the keepers of the inn.
Just shade! And just in time (we thought)
There was a myrtle tree. She fought,
But you were big and she was thin,
And there was blood, and we were men . . . ”
The road from here to Babylon is hard, Hadassah. It's not fun, and even less if you're a Jew. And we were three—or four, with you. Three hundred miles of sweat and hate. And you were big and three weeks late. And no one gave us room. The heat was indescribable. Her feet were swollen, scarlet hot. He prayed, your father, Abihail, for shade. That's all! Not for a house or nurse, or stream or birthing stool or purse to bribe the keepers of the inn. Just shade! And just in time (we thought) there was a myrtle tree. She fought, but you were big and she was thin, and there was blood, and we were men...
Did mother ever hold me—once?"

Yes, right away! And your response
Was perfect peace. I wish that I Could tell you what she said, but my Heart moved me back as Abihail
Knelt down to kiss your mother’s pale
And sweaty face and stroke your hair.
I couldn’t hear what happened there,
And Abihail would never say Too much. Just this: 'The myrtle was A gift of God. Jehovah does
What he must do. But there was shade!
And we agreed, the girl is made
To be a myrtle, comfort, shield.
And so together there we sealed
Her name: Hadassah in the tongue
Of Israel. May she be sung
In festival for centuries
To come.'
Alone and on his knees
Your father dug her grave beneath
The myrtle tree, and pushed the dirt
In with his own strong hands. The hurt,
As you may guess, was deeper than The grave. We prayed and then we ran
With you. God led us to a house,
And we besought the farmer’s spouse
For mercy and a nurse. 'You’re Jews,
She said, 'Perhaps my man could use
A few “employees” for a spell.
Whose kid is this?’ 'She’s mine, you tell
Your husband I will work his farm
If you can keep this child from harm.'
For two long years, Hadassah, we Were Jewish slaves, but you were free
From harm, and grew up like a tree
Beside the brook of loyalty—
The loyalty of God to his Design. He never doubted this,
Your father, Abihail, I mean.
The tree of hope stayed ever green
That Shimei had planted in His heart. And neither pain nor sin
Nor death could break the fibers of His mighty faith: that sovereign love
Would somehow take your mother’s death,
His father’s dream, your living breath,
And weave them with some loving lace
Into a tapestry of grace.
I’ve never known a stronger man Than Abihail, your father.”

Can
You tell me, Abba, what became
Of him? To me he’s just a name.
But I would like to know him, see His face, his hope, especially
The dream.”
He worked himself so thin
That when the fever came, his skin
Hung on his bones like dough. I nursed
Him to the end. He never cursed
A soul, not one, alive or dead,
But near the end looked up and said,
'Could you please take me, Mordecai,
Down to the myrtle tree to die?'
He worked himself so thin that when the fever came, his skin hung on his bones like dough. I nursed him to the end. He never cursed a soul, not one, alive or dead, but near the end looked up and said, 'Could you please take me, Mordecai, down to the myrtle tree to die?'
I laid him by your mother’s grave,
And waited through the night. He gave His final thought for you: once more
He whispered motionless, 'Before
I die give me your word, my friend,
To bring her to the journey’s end,
To Susa, as my father dreamed.
For it must be that God has deemed
For you and for Hadassah there
To see the answer to our prayer.'
He took my hand, 'Swear, Mordecai,
As long as there's a Persian sky,
You will not take Hadassah back To Israel. And if you lack For anything, then perish if You must, but not beside the cliff
Of Borsippa or Jordan stream.
Forsake not, Mordecai, the dream
Of Shimei and Abihail.
The plan of God can never fail.
We have not followed him in vain.'
You see, Hadassah, even pain
Could not suffice to break the hope
Of Abihail, or dim the scope
Of his design for you. I took
You yet that night, and we forsook
The shame of slavery and came To Susa. Here another name
I gave to you to make your way
As easy as I could. They say
That Esther means ‘a brilliant star.’”
I thank you, Abba. Ten years are A lot of love for fathering
A cousin.”
Esther, let us sing
Now, like you said, together eye
To eye. The God who made the sky
And rules the earth with awesome might,
Is wielding all the world this night
To bring this story to an end
Beyond our power to comprehend.”
At thirty-five her hair was fine
And cinder black. Nor was there sign
Of aging in her queenly face.
And those who saw the tiny trace
Of tragedy left in her eyes,
Compared it to the Persian skies
When storms have purged the gloomy air,
And left the faintest rainbow there.

She gave her firstborn son the name
Of Abihail, and hoped the flame
Of faith would burn in him, as pure
And bright as once burned deep and sure
Within her father’s breast.
At thirty-five her hair was fine And cinder black. Nor was there sign
Of aging in her queenly face. And those who saw the tiny trace
Of tragedy left in her eyes,
Compared it to the Persian skies
When storms have purged the gloomy air,
And left the faintest rainbow there.

She gave her firstborn son the name
Of Abihail, and hoped the flame
Of faith would burn in him, as pure
And bright as once burned deep and sure
Within her father's breast.
One night

The boy said, "Mamma, am I right
That you became the queen because You were so beautiful? And laws
Were changed because you were so brave?"

Queen Esther smiled, "Can you behave
If I let you stay up a while?
If so, we’ll put another pile
Of logs into the fire, and I
Will tell you, Abihail, just why
Your mommy is the Queen of all
The land—from Egypt to the tall
And snowy Himalayas.”
Behave,” he said, and tried to smile
And look as wide awake as he Could look for being five. "And we Can sit here by the fire,” he said,
"And later I can go to bed
When you’re all through. Okay?”

She said (the way moms do). "Could be We’ll need another night, you know.
We can’t talk till the roosters crow!”
And so they stoked the fire once more,
And Esther shut the royal door,
And Abihail climbed in her lap,
And nestled with his little cap
Beneath her royal chin.
And so they stoked the fire once more, and Esther shut the royal door, and Abihail climbed in her lap, and nestled with his little cap beneath her royal chin.
Your great-grandfather had a dream: "Now wait
No more in Babylon," a voice
From heaven said, "But come, rejoice,
For God has made a plan to save
His people through your son. A slave
Will turn the powers of unbelief
Upon their heads, and all the grief
Of captive Israel will turn
To joy." Of course, we had to learn,
In time, that what the dream had meant
Was that, though Abihail was sent—
The son of Shimei—’twas I
And your good uncle Mordecai
Would come at God’s appointed time,
And block the hate-filled, bloody crime
Of Haman.”
Mommy, he was bad.”

I’ll tell you, Abigail, the sad
And ugly truth: Indeed he was A wicked man. A coward does
A lot of sneaky things to make Himself look good when he’s a fake.
And Haman even tried to bring
Ten thousand talents to the king,
And all in silver, if the Jews
Could all be caught and killed. And why?
Because he hated Mordecai!”
But, Mommy, Mordecai is good."

Indeed he is! And solid wood,
My son, makes rotten timber rage.
The wicked Haman in his cage
Of cowardice could not abide
The freedom of the man outside."
And did the king, my dad, agree?”

Sometimes, dear Abihail, we see Things different than they are, and make
What later seems a big mistake.
He did agree. But God did not Allow success for Haman’s plot,
Nor of the king’s decree. It seems
That this is what the noble dreams
Of Shimei were all about,
And why my father didn’t doubt.
God had a plan to save the Jews
From Haman’s wicked scheme: to use
Not Shimei, nor Abihail,
Nor mighty armies to assail
The Persian palace walls, but me,
A Jewish orphan girl, to free
The sons of Israel from death.
And even now it takes my breath
Away to think about the ways
Of God, and how from ancient days
He planned it all, and ruled the world,
Right down to how my hair was curled,
God had a plan to save the Jews from Haman's wicked scheme: to use not Shimei, nor Abihail, nor mighty armies to assail the Persian palace walls, but me, a Jewish orphan girl, to free the sons of Israel from death. And even now it takes my breath away to think about the ways of God, and how from ancient days He planned it all, and ruled the world, right down to how my hair was curled.
When all the girls were gathered for
The king to see, and what I wore,
And how I walked, and everything
It took to cause a Persian king
To choose from all the women in The world this exiled Jewish kin
Of Shimei. O, Abihail!
I hope you see, and never fail
To know that there’s a God in charge
Of all the world. He governs large
And small. He sets up kings to reign,
And takes the lion by the mane.
None moves without the Lord’s command,
And none can stay his mighty hand.”
But, Mommy, weren’t you ever scared?”

Yes, Abihail, but God prepared
A special gift for me one night:
He showed me that by doing right
And trusting him, there would be less
To lose and more to gain! And yes,
Should I have even lost my life,
It would be true: to be the wife
Of Persia’s king, and false to God,
Is no reward. What good to trod
A bridge of gold above a flood
Of icy hate and Jewish blood?”
What did you do to save the Jews?”

Your uncle Mordecai sent news
To me about the king’s decree,
And said that I should try to see
The king, and tell him I’m a Jew.
And even when your uncle knew
That I could lose my life this way,
He said, ‘If on this dark’ning day
You hold your tongue, God will provide Protection from some other side,
And you will die. But, Esther, think:
Is not there now some holy link
Of precious providence between
The Jewish plight and who is queen?’
What did you do to save the Jews?"

Your uncle Mordecai sent news to me about the king's decree, and said that I should try to see the king, and tell him I'm a Jew. And even when your uncle knew that I could lose my life this way, he said, 'If on this dark'ning day you hold your tongue, God will provide protection from some other side, and you will die. But, Esther, think: is not there now some holy link of precious providence between the Jewish plight and who is queen?'
And so your uncle Mordecai
Filled me with hope. ‘If I must die
Then I will die,’ your mother said.”
The sleepy prince picked up his head
And asked, "Did Daddy change his mind?"
I’d rather say, God touched the blind,”
The queen replied. “You see, dear son,
If you would truly know what’s done
Upon the earth, you have to ask:
What power is hid behind the mask
Of man’s design? Am I the queen
Because of looks? What does it mean
That Haman hung on gallows made
For Mordecai, and that the blade
Aimed at the Jews, instead of these Was thrust against their enemies?”
I'd rather say, God touched the blind,” the queen replied. “You see, dear son, if you would truly know what’s done upon the earth, you have to ask: What power is hid behind the mask of man’s design? Am I the queen because of looks? What does it mean that Haman hung on gallows made for Mordecai, and that the blade aimed at the Jews, instead of these was thrust against their enemies?”
There once was a baby born under a tree,
Her dear mamma died, and nobody could see,
Her daddy knelt down by her side on his knee,
And no one but God knew what this girl would be.

Her branches spread out and their beauty was seen,
The shade that she made was a deep myrtle green,
An orphan and lovely as she turned eighteen,
And no one but God knew: Tomorrow a queen.

But Abihail was breathing deep,
And soon the lad would be asleep.
So Esther closed his drooping eyes
And prayed that God would make him wise.
And then she sang a lullaby
That she had learned from Mordecai:
There once was a baby born under a tree,
Her dear mamma died, and nobody could see,
Her daddy knelt down by her side on his knee,
And no one but God knew what this girl would be.

Her branches spread out and their beauty was seen,
The shade that she made was a deep myrtle green,
An orphan and lovely as she turned eighteen,
And no one but God knew: Tomorrow a queen.
Rest well, my precious Abihail,
When you are weak, God will prevail.
Trust now the Lord your soul to keep,
He rules the nations while you sleep.”
Now listen, children, young and old,
God multiplies ten thousandfold
The little power that we bring.
He makes our winter weakness sing
Of his full summer’s strength, and burns
The rags of shame to ashes, turns
The course of human history, blocks
The haughty schemes of strutting cocks,
And brings the prophecies of men
To naught. And rising up, he then,
Against all high conspiracies,
And proud imperial machines,
Makes orphans into kings and queens.
Now listen, children, young and old,
God multiplies ten-thousandfold
The little power that we bring.
He makes our winter weakness sing
Of his full summer’s strength, and burns
The rags of shame to ashes, turns
The course of history, blocks
The haughty schemes of strutting cocks,
And brings the prophecies of men
To naught. And rising up, he then,
Against all high conspiracies,
And proud imperial machines,
Makes orphans into kings and queens.”

Capturing our imaginations and hearts,
John Piper introduces us to Esther the poor
orphan and Esther the Persian queen—
creatively musing about what could have been in the midst of what really was. Using poetry to tell a moving story, Piper’s words—when woven together with paintings by Glenn Harrington—
awakens wonder in us as we experience the begin-
ings and endings of Esther’s life and see
throughout the purposeful hand of God.